FOREWORD

Far removed from the eastern seaboard which witnessed the landing of the Pilgrims and the stirring scenes of Colonial times that followed, Detroit nevertheless has a keen interest in the celebration of an event whose significance has become long since of national import. At the same stirring period Detroit was making history of hardly less significance. The very heart throbs of the Colonies seemed to find a response here as evidenced in our frequent participation in the Colonial wars. Added to its rich historical background are the traditions of the east which moved here with the adventurous settlers who came to find their fortunes in a land far removed from their fine ancestry. These settlers brought with them a laudable family pride and many heirlooms which today are treasured not alone for their historical significance, but because they are invaluable evidences of the culture of Colonial times. Much of the furniture and many of the objects of household art were imported from the mother country during that consistent period of the XVIII. century (or were emulated by Colonial manufacturers), when taste was the rule rather than the exception. We turn to the artistic achievements of this period with keen interest and delight because nearly everything that was made for household consumption was good in design and of fine quality.

The patriotic societies of this city, to which we are largely indebted for this exhibition, have been the active agencies to stimulate interest in, and preserve inviolate these treasures and traditions of a historic past of which we are all proud, and which find material expression in the present exhibit largely recruited from Detroit homes.
